Current Issues and Developments

- Norway has built an international reputation around its role as a peace-broker, mastering the art of its “quiet” yet effective diplomacy. In contrast, it has long ignored the potential of external cultural diplomacy. This has changed in the early 2000s with the careful modelling of the “Brand Norway”. In order to promote and commercialize Norwegian cultural products internationally, followed a stronger cooperation of the MFA and seven advisory agencies. Unfortunately, the fruits of this labour are yet to be seen. Internationally still too little is known about Norwegian arts and culture. However, at the same time, Norway has built a formidable reputation as a trustworthy dialogue-facilitator and generous aid-donor. The results of such low-key diplomacy might not be immediately evident or recognised, but when the time is ripe, it will likewise yield positive results.
• Compared to its proactive European neighbours, Norway still lacks a clear-cut and holistic strategy on the recruitment of international students. Foreign students are not lacking motivation: Norway is their preferred study place because of the quality of the education, Norwegian nature, and the perception of Norway as a peaceful and safe society. Norwegian higher institutions should grasp this opportunity and make early preparation for developing Norway into one of the more popular study destinations in Europe. With many English-degree programs, top-ranked universities, and a high standard of living, it certainly has plenty of bandwidth to make it happen.
